BIRD IS THE WORD
Spot a variety of birds, from waterfowl to raptors. Find unusual birds in one of Saunders’ favorite parks for birding, Englewood MetroPark. You’ll also find a nature play area — hands-on play areas made from natural materials — and hiking opportunities for children.

PLAN A PICNIC
Hills & Dales MetroPark is a must, according to Saunders. Her daughters love the creek and nature play area, in addition to enjoying a meal outdoors. Cox Arboretum, Possum Creek, Wegerzyn Gardens, Carriage Hill and Island MetroParks are filled with kids’ activities and are perfect places to picnic. Saunders suggests exploring a teachable moment with your little ones, such as talking about the importance of picking up your trash.

EXCITE YOUR SENSES
Children and adults can excite their senses at Wegerzyn Gardens MetroPark. Take in the sights and smells of the formal gardens then allow the kids to immerse themselves in sensory play in the Children’s Discovery Garden. Saunders enjoys finding new colors with her daughters and encourages them to be mindful of the natural world around them by enjoying the calming effects of nature in quiet spaces.

LOVE LOCAL HISTORY
MetroParks offers unique outdoor opportunities that allow visitors to experience the rich history of Dayton. Saunders suggests a visit to the Inventors River Walk to explore some of Dayton’s most famous creations. Next, head to Carriage Hill MetroPark, where kids will enjoy living history on an 1880s farm and meet farm animals.

DEAR METROPARKS FRIENDS,

Welcome, 2022!

In this issue of ParkWays, you’ll notice the return of program listings starting on page 16. MetroParks staff have been busy planning programs, events and opportunities — most of them held in person — to help you experience the outdoors.* We’re so excited for the return of many of our community’s favorites, along with some new offerings!

In the following pages, you’ll also learn more about the ways in which time spent in nature helps improve physical and mental health. Five Rivers MetroParks provides a variety of choices about how to participate in outdoor activities and spend time in nature to enhance everyone’s health. We began focusing on the health benefits of spending time in nature in the wake of the pandemic and have continued to build on this in your MetroParks, such as creating Mindfulness Walks and Let’s Explore adventures, which give families with young children guided activities for spending time in nature. Find out more about Mindfulness Walks on page 22 and more about Let’s Explore on page 24.

In recent years, more research and data have become available that support nature as a healthy lifestyle tool. As such, we are continuing to create programs and opportunities for Montgomery County area residents to find solace and support in nature. Read more about the health benefits of spending time in nature on pages 4-5.

One recent study in the journal People and Nature from the British Ecological Society studied the impact of pandemic-related lockdowns and children’s connection to nature. Perhaps not surprisingly, many children were out in nature more during lockdowns, maybe because being outside was one of the safest places to be.

As our nation, state and community continue to recover from the pandemic, we sincerely hope some of the habits you developed during the pandemic, such as a daily walk outdoors, remain part of your life. Continuing to be intentional about how you use your time, who you are with and where you spend it are great ways to support a healthy, active lifestyle. Your MetroParks are places where you can get and stay healthy — all while spending time in nature.

Best Regards,

Becky Benná
Executive Director

ON THE COVER
Artist Cydnie King in front of one of her drawings, Gingko Wings.
Cydnie King has trained her son, 3, to bring her leaves.

“Sometimes, we press them so I can draw them later on,” said the Fairborn-based artist and curatorial assistant at The Contemporary Dayton.

It’s an appropriate task for her “little outdoorsman.” King began incorporating nature into her art during a college assignment in which students had to find a natural object, study it for a week, and draw it over and over again.

“I picked a leaf, and as I watched it decay and shrivel and crumble, I noticed how its veins looked like our own,” King said. “I started drawing natural objects attached to people to show how humanity is connected to nature and how nature is always present.”

While her art has evolved through the years, one thing has remained consistent: King focuses on her interpretations of the human connection to nature.

“I show botanicals as part of the human body to emphasize that parts of humanity are very similar to parts of the natural world,” she said, “and that the bond between the two is still present — no matter how much humanity tries to sometimes distance itself.”

Yet artists aren’t the only ones who use nature as a source of inspiration. Engineers, architects, chefs, designers — the list is endless. It includes educators, too.

Adventure Central (AC) is an after-school and summer program located at Wesleyan MetroPark and a partnership between Five Rivers MetroParks, The Ohio State University Extension and 4-H. Nature and time outdoors are at the core of AC’s curriculum.
“The kids are always antsy to get outside, from the smallest to the oldest,” said Angela Collie, AC’s program coordinator.

Outside is where a lot of learning takes place at AC. Students grow veggies in AC’s garden and explore changes in the MetroPark and Wolf Creek throughout the seasons. Time outdoors helps them learn about polymers, photosynthesis, wildlife identification and much more.

“We make everything a game and show kids how to care for nature early on so when they get older, it’s not foreign to them,” Collie said. “Schools teach the basics, and we’re able to reinforce them through these nature-based activities.”

In addition to its beauty and teachable moments, nature is an inspiration because of its many positive effects on humans’ physical and mental health.

Scott Hall, University of Dayton professor and clinical mental health counseling program coordinator, said there’s an abundance of research documenting these effects.

“When we think about holistic wellness — physical, mental, emotional and social health — the research really highlights the fact that nature, just by its design, promotes wellbeing in all those areas,” Hall said.

For example, time in nature lowers blood pressure and stress hormones, reduces muscle tension and allows the whole nervous system to recalibrate. It increases energy levels and productivity, improves sleep, boosts immunity — and enhances creativity.

“There are a lot of positive things happening when we spend time in nature that we’re not even aware of that encourage our wellbeing,” Hall said. “If you know you’re going to be or are challenged with something, take a walk. Research shows if you can walk outside for 15 minutes before a test, it will triple your ability to focus and stay cognitively sharp.”

Hall also has a private counseling practice, and he tells clients one of the fundamental things they can do to improve their health is to spend just 20 minutes in a space they identify as “nature.”

“At the end of the day, we have to take care of nature,” he said. “Promoting wildlife, increasing greenspace, encouraging involvement in nature — I can’t think of a more meaningful initiative for human wellbeing than that.”

King hopes her art helps people think about this and their connection to the natural world.

“I hope they come away with a new appreciation for nature, that my pieces make them stop for a minute because they see something in a plant they’ve never really seen before,” she said. “I want people to remember we’re all part of the same planet and whatever we do affects nature. I want people to re-realize it’s very important that we stay connected to nature.”

Learn more about King’s work, Adventure Central, and about the ways time in nature improves mental and physical health on MetroParks’ blog by visiting metroparks.org/natureisopen.
Behind Five Rivers MetroParks’ conservation practices, you’ll find a lot of science and research — little of which involves a traditional lab and beakers. In fact, most of the time you’ll find MetroParks’ biologist, Lisa Zoromski, and the rest of the agency’s parks and conservation team in the parks, surveying, measuring, mowing, planting and even burning.

“It’s really important to look at the impact we have, whether it’s on wildlife, plants or insects — ecosystems are complex,” said Zoromski. “It’s hard to tell our effect by just looking at an area, but we can plan ahead through surveys.”

During the spring and fall, a portion of a prairie or thicket may be on fire during what are called prescribed burns, which release nutrients into the soil and stimulate growth of desired plant species. Prescribed burns also keep prairies in check, preventing woody plants from growing into large trees that will eventually change the dynamic of the habitat.

Starting last October, MetroParks began its first round of fall prescribed burns as part an effort to increase plant diversity in its prairies. In addition to burning, mowing and re-seeding are also used to manage prairies. To assess which methods are most successful, Zoromski is leading prairie survey efforts at Taylorsville and Englewood MetroParks.
The prairies were separated into sections, each receiving different treatments and combinations of treatments, including (a) fall burns, (b) fall burns and winter seeding, (c) fall burns and spring mowing, and (d) spring mowing alone. As with all good research, a portion of the prairie will remain untreated as a control for comparison.

Conducting this research will allow MetroParks’ conservation team to determine which land management efforts result in the most diverse prairies, with good mixtures of grass and flowering plants, and fewer woody plants.

In addition to prairie surveys, MetroParks’ conservation team work with trail specialists to conduct trail surveys on an ongoing basis and before trails are built, re-routed or expanded. This process includes surveying the presence of all plant species in a proposed trail corridor and surrounding areas.

After conducting the survey, MetroParks’ parks and conservation staff discuss how to best minimize harm to plants. This can include reconfiguring a trail or relocating or seeding plants.

In May 2021, parks and conservation staff began surveying a proposed re-route of a portion of Germantown MetroPark’s orange trail. So far, conservation technicians Kevin Reichling and Nicole Freshour have identified 58 species of plants, including some rare species such as wild hyacinth.

Zoromski – who started with MetroParks in 2021 – understands monitoring natural areas is important because humans and their pets affect the environment, even when they are using Leave No Trace principles.

“People could go out and keep building trails, but how does that affect the environment?” Zoromski asked. “Research has shown that the presence of a dog on a trail - especially off leash - can increase the flight distance of birds. This is why we monitor: To be the best stewards of the environment we can, while also allowing people to connect to nature on the trails.”

A century ago, a portion of Possum Creek was home to the 200-acre Argonne Forest Park, a former amusement park.

Null Hodapp founded the park, named after the World War I battle of Argonne Forest in France, where he served with the 322nd Field Artillery. Fellow WWI veterans built Argonne Forest Park in honor of those who served during the Great War.

Argonne Forest Park, dedicated in July 1927, served as a reunion grounds for veterans and their families. Local businesses, clubs and associations also rented the park for private picnics. It was home to such amenities as a clubhouse, midway, swimming pool and baseball field, where parades and sham battles were held.

Today, you can explore remnants of Argonne Forest Park, including a dance floor and streetcars used as cabins and for concessions, by hiking the 1.4-mile purple loop trail. Most hikers can complete this easy, natural-surface trail without a lot of elevation change in an hour to an hour-and-a-half.

With less vegetation to block views, winter and spring are a great time to see these remnants. This spring, new interpretive signage telling the story of Argonne Forest Park will be installed along the trail, adding a dose of history to your hike. Time has changed the landscape as a mixed hardwood forest has grown around the remnants and into the space once filled with open fields and beech woods.

While many amusement parks now are dominated by roller coasters and Ferris wheels, Argonne Forest Park was designed with amenities for people to play and enjoy the outdoors together.

Through the decades, one thing remains the same: Spending time outdoors improves your physical and mental health now as much as it did 100 years ago.

People begin volunteering at Five Rivers MetroParks for many reasons. As a volunteer, perhaps one of the best experiences you can have is to work alongside MetroParks’ experts. This allows volunteers to learn new things and build skills they can apply at home or in their neighborhood.

Horticulturalist Allison Bush works with gardening volunteers in MetroParks’ urban parks, such as RiverScape MetroPark. Bush treats her volunteers as teammates and wants them to continuously get as much from their experiences at MetroParks as they give.

“I always include an educational aspect when I do a talk, even if it’s something simple like weeding,” said Bush. With degrees focused in horticulture and natural resources, plus years of experience as a landscape designer and arborist, Bush brings a lot to the gardening plot. However, her efforts alone couldn’t sustain the daily maintenance needed to keep these parks looking beautiful and healthy, which is why the assistance from volunteers is so important and valued.

Volunteers join Bush on Tuesdays and Thursdays (and during Service Saturdays, held monthly from May-September) to perform tasks such as planting bulbs, tree pruning, planting, mulching and more. They even join in on the fun to create seasonal elements, such as winter gnomes.

“My favorite thing is when volunteers learn something new,” Bush said. “I enjoy seeing them take home what they have learned to share with friends and family.”

Because volunteers learn so much from MetroParks’ experts, you don’t need to have any gardening experience to start. If you have an interest in becoming a better gardener at home, volunteering is a great way to hone your skills. As an added bonus, you get to see your hard work in bloom.

Those interested in gardening – or any volunteer opportunity – can learn more and see what opportunities are available at metroparks.org/volunteer.

Five Rivers MetroParks has made a strategic acquisition of a property near the Stillwater River — and the public now has a new way to support MetroParks’ conservation mission to protect the region’s natural heritage.

Abby Whitesell, 102, and her son, Bill Whitesell, owned the 62.4-acre property as an investment and leased it to a farmer who grew corn and soybeans through this past growing season. The Whitesells contacted Five Rivers MetroParks when they were looking to sell the property, located near Frederick Pike and Needmore Road.

Because the Whitesell property met two of MetroParks’ land protection goals – protect natural areas adjacent to river corridors and establish buffer areas to maintain open space – the agency moved forward with the purchase.

Because the Whitesells were willing to sell the property to MetroParks for below market value, the family was able to donate a balance of the value of the property to the Five Rivers MetroParks Foundation.

And because of that generous donation, the Foundation has established a permanently endowed fund called the Land Conservation Endowment Fund. Now, those who would like to financially support MetroParks’ conservation efforts can donate to that fund, which specifically will be used to maintain existing land and acquire properties that protect and connect natural areas. In addition, donations to the new fund will go toward the endowment, accruing interest and growing over time.

“Five Rivers MetroParks is a conservation agency, and the public has told us they want MetroParks to protect the Miami Valley’s natural resources,” said Eric Sauer, MetroParks’ planning manager. “We’re not interested in buying every piece of available property. We are strategic about protecting lands located along streams and rivers that create riparian buffers, properties adjacent to those...
MetroParks already owns, properties with distinct natural features, and those that connect corridors and parks.

The Whitesell property increases the natural buffer between the Stillwater River and a developed area. It expands the Stillwater Conservation Area, which is part of the more than 16,000 acres of land MetroParks manages — 90% of it in its natural state, protected from development.

Work on the new property will begin this spring with soil testing, developing a plan to transition the land from its prior agriculture use to a natural area, and planting native grasses and wildflowers.

“You’ll see some pretty significant changes within a year,” Sauer said. “The bigger impact will be in the second to fourth years, and eventually, long after we’re here, it will be a woodland.”

A number of Five Rivers MetroParks locations once were farmland, such as Possum Creek and Sugarcreek MetroParks. MetroParks also is transitioning former farmland into natural area at Spring Run Conservation Area in Trotwood, and it’s transformed prior farmland now part of Germantown MetroPark into such habitats as prairie and wetlands. (Pro tip: Hike the purple trail at Germantown to experience this transition.)

“With the benefit of a few years of transitional planning, we’ll see the same results on the Whitesell property,” Sauer said.

And as for the new Land Conservation Endowment Fund? “It allows you to know directly where your money is going,” he said. “If you want to support and expand MetroParks’ conservation efforts, you can have a direct impact.”

Alexis Larsen has joined Five Rivers MetroParks’ executive leadership team as its new chief of philanthropy to lead all of MetroParks’ philanthropic and development efforts, including various giving options, sponsorships and the Access to Nature financial assistance program. Larsen also oversees the Five Rivers MetroParks Foundation and serves as the agency’s liaison with The James M. Cox, Jr. Arboretum Foundation and Wegerzyn Gardens Foundation.

Previously, Larsen served as the external affairs director for 10 years at the Dayton Art Institute (DAI), where she oversaw staff and volunteers in fundraising more than $16 million.

Larsen is a graduate of Wright State University with a bachelor of arts degree in mass communications. She is involved with the Association of Fundraising Professionals, is a graduate of Leadership Dayton and was named one of Women in Business Networking’s 25 Women to Watch in 2019.

“Leading the philanthropic efforts for Five Rivers MetroParks is a chance to give back to what I’m passionate about — outdoor recreation, conservation and connecting people to nature,” Larsen said. “I’m excited to build new partnerships, open doors to impactful giving, and identify support that will help MetroParks further support conservation locally and provide healthy outdoor experiences for everyone in our community.”

Contact Alexis Larsen at (937) 275-PARK or alexis.larsen@metroparks.org.
Five Rivers MetroParks operates 30 outstanding public locations. Founded in 1963 to serve the greater Dayton area, MetroParks protects more than 16,000 acres of open space and provides year-round recreation, education and conservation opportunities. BINGE WATCH
decoding nature

All seven episodes of this series highlighting the past, present and future of your Five Rivers Metroparks are now available to watch for free online at nearthtv.com. Episodes are 12-18 minutes long and each focused on a different aspect of Metroparks and the role access to nature has played in Dayton’s development.

Indigo Life Media produced Decoding Nature, which was sponsored by the Five Rivers Metroparks Foundation; The James M. Cox, Jr. Foundation; Wegerzyn Gardens Foundation; and Wagner Subaru.
CONSERVATION KIDS

This series nurtures kids’ desire to explore nature and provides families inspiration to spend time outdoors. Children ages 3-13 will grow closer to and learn about nature, develop leadership skills, work with peers to protect our region’s natural heritage — and ultimately become stewards of the environment and advocates for conservation who are empowered to speak out for the planet they will inherit.

Conservation Kids programs are organized in three levels. This allows children to build onto their knowledge and skills as well as experience the positive impact that they can have through habitat improvement and citizen science opportunities. Families should start by taking Discover level (▲ green) programs and continue with Act level (▲ blue) and Share level (▲ orange) programs. Colored triangles in the program listings identify each program’s level.

Children who complete Conservation Kids programs in each of the three levels will receive a special reward and become eligible to assist in leading future programs.

Visit metroparks.org/kids for more information and to view Act and Share level programs as they’re announced throughout the season.
